This three-volume survey brings together a team of leading scholars to explore the syntactic and morphological structures of the world's languages. Clearly organized and broad-ranging, it covers topics such as parts-of-speech, passives, complementation, relative clauses, adverbial clauses, inflectional morphology, tense, aspect, mood, and diexis. The contributors look at the major ways that these notions are realized, and provide informative sketches of them at work in a range of languages.

Based on this parameter, three types of language are recognized: isolating, agglutinating, and fusional. An isolating language typically has a one-to-one correspondence between a morpheme and a word; that is, in such a language every morpheme is an independent word. An example of an almost perfectly isolating language is Vietnamese, as illustrated in (1) (Thompson (1987:207)).

Review Articles Language typology and syntactic description

Linguistic typology is a field of linguistics that studies and classifies languages according to their structural and functional features. Its aim is to describe and explain the common properties and the structural diversity of the world's languages. Its subdisciplines include, but are not limited to: qualitative typology, which deals with the issue of comparing languages and within-language variance; quantitative typology, which deals with the distribution of structural patterns in the ...
